Highlights from Thursday, April 24

Anupam Kher premiered his short film "I Went Shopping for Robert De Niro" followed by an acting workshop at the historic downtown Tampa Theatre. Francis Vayalumkal, founder of the local India International Film Festival, attended. Here are his thoughts:

"I decided to go to Anupam Kher's workshop to meet him and see his approach to acting as he explains it. I had heard of his acting school Actor Prepares. With no interest in an acting career, I was skeptical if this would be a waste of time. However, at the end of the workshop, I walked out with a lot more than tips about acting. Anupam Kher offered lessons that anyone could use in regular life. It turned out to be an acting workshop combined with a motivational speaking session. It was amazing to see how the actor took members from the audience through an emotional yet entertaining journey through simple instructions. At several occasions, the acting exercises became very personal for the volunteers and the emotions were real, making even Anupam Kher himself teary-eyed as he participated in one. I wish the event was attended by more people who would've been interested. It was a very unique experience for me sitting through an acting workshop and walking away with lessons to be used in everyday life and inspired to do great things."
